WHITERIVER — Noland Clay, a full-blood Indian boy from the remote village of Canyon Day on the Fort Apache Indian Reservation, will co-star with Gregory Peck and Eva Marie Saint in a real suspense drama set in the west.

Robert Mulligan and Allan Pakula, who directed and produced "To Kill A Mockingbird", spent many days in searching for the intense young warrior who will lend interest and authenticity to one of the greatest films to come out of western America.

Noland, shown here with his father and mother, Felix and Helen Clay, smiles bravely just before going on location in the Valley of Fire near Las Vegas, Nevada.

The latter portion of the film by National General Productions, Inc. will be shot in Hollywood. Noland is expected to be involved approximately three months.

He was selected after Mrs. Richard Cooley, Kinishba, took four youngsters to Hollywood in December for screen tests. Arrangements for the tests and the trip were made by the White Mountain Recreation Enterprise.

Thirty-one other local Apaches were flown to Nevada last week to play support roles in the movie, titled "The Stalking Moon". This group will return from the location about the 20th of January.
